It was Le Corbusier's Villa Savoye (薩伏瓦別墅) that most succinctly summed up his five (point, points) of architecture, (which, when) he (have, had) been developing throughout the 1920s.

First, Le Corbusier (lift, lifted) the bulk of the structure off the ground (support, supporting) it by pilotis – (reinforce, reinforced) concrete stilts. These pilotis, in (providing, provide) the structural support for the house, allowed him to elucidate his next two points: a free façade, meaning non-supporting walls that could (designed, be designed) as the architect wished, and (an, a) open floor plan, meaning that the floor space was free to be configured into rooms without concern for supporting (wall walls).

The second floor (of, to) the Villa Savoye (include, includes) long strips of ribbon windows that (allow, allows) unencumbered views of the large surrounding yard, and (which, where) constitute the (forth, fourth) point of his system.
